The metal chair froze me where I sat. No windows. nothing in the room, but the metal chair I sat in. His presence filled the small space with an electric charge. He didn t walk in, no, it was more of a float. He stood before me with electric indigo eyes. His skin wasn t ivory or tan, no, it wasn t human flesh. His features were sharp - very sharp. With lips so thin it was almost impossible to detect if he even had a mouth. Gray. That s the color I would use to describe his skin, but not an ugly gray. It shimmered with hints of blue. I knew I would be meeting him, but no amount of training and no amount of undercover work with the CIA could ever prepare me for our introduction. I know you love her. That is the only reason for you being here. I am only appearing to you because it is time you learn the truth about her. He never introduced himself...
