The sun is setting; on the hills The slanting shadows lie; Tis time to salt the cattle That roam the uplands high. Come out and hear me call them--They ll answer to my cry. Then loud the master shouts, until The hills and woods resound, And many a mocking echo Repeats the mellow sound; There s not a sign of cattle In all the pastures round. Hark! once again the call rings out, And faintly on the air Comes the soft low of cattle; And look! from everywhere, North, south and cost, the herds crowd on, Wild for their wonted fare. With heads tossed high and nostrils red, And eager eyes afire, They stamp and stride and bellow, Wild with their fierce desire, And crowd, two hundred head or more, Close to the guarding wire. Opens the massive gate, and in Among that motley crew Of dun and white and red and brown He threads a passage through--The master, with his bag of salt--A daring deed to view. Here, Crump! ho, Dick! and right and left He thrusts them as they close; Take care, old Buster, greedy bones--Ho! Buck and Black and Mose! Keep to the right, you restless brutes, And on and on he goes Throwing the salt in luscious heaps, Till all the hungry crew Make for their pastures, satisfied To crop the grass anew; And the wide gate...
